Students want healthy food

Students in East Hampton Middle School decided to stop using their cafeteria after seeing the documentary ‘Super Size Me’. The protest began when about 150 students and their parents were shown a film in which the director, Morgan Spurlock, eats only fast food for a month. The film attacks the state for providing schools with unhealthy food, and it was shown as part of a new health and nutrition program at the school.

‘After seeing the film, some students decided to stop buying meals at school,’ said Ginny Reale, the school’s health teacher who helps run the health and nutrition program. Other teachers also mentioned the idea in their classes, and word spread through the school, which has 465 students.

Teachers and students could not say how many people had stopped using the cafeteria, but queues in front of the lunchroom door were much shorter on a recent Wednesday. After seeing the film, ‘we started talking about how our school didn’t have the best lunches for us,’ said Devon McGorisk, one of the students in the class that began the protest. ‘We wrote down a list of the foods that we wanted.’ That list included more salads, fresh sandwiches, fruit salad, and even sushi.

There was a meeting with the company that prepares the school lunches and several students presented a list of demands. After the meeting, yogurt was added to the menu, but not much else. Although the cafeteria serves salads, sandwiches and fruit, students and teachers said the healthiest meals usually disappear quickly. Because the lunch period is only 20 minutes – common in schools throughout the area – students often avoid the long queues for the meals and go into the faster and cheaper snack bar where they can get cookies, bagels and sugary drinks.
